Dear Mr. Black:-

Thanks for yours of recent date and at earliest leisure I will read your Booth critique and invetigate further your findings. There are some psychic matters connected with the Bates-Booth book which in my mind still need clarifying.

Did you examine the Booth skeleton (Mummy) now in possession of Mrs. Bates? If not, then why did you examine everything else but it and pass up the outstanding proof against your thesis?

What is the proof that it was the left rather than the right shin bone in Booth's leg that was broken when he jumped from the balcony to the stage in the Ford Theater after shooting Lincoln?

Why did Bates (being mistaken as to the leg broken) put such little stress on that main point of proof, and what becomes of your thesis if the proof shows that the bone in the left leg of the Booth mummy, now in possession of Mrs. Bates, has been broken and healed?

But more anon when I have leisure.

Respectfully,

James W. Zachary.
