Original copy

GREENFIELD VILLAGE

Monday, October 16, 1939

Finishing touches are being put on the Cotswold dove-cote, a revolving ladder leading to the nests having been installed inside and a chicken wire now enclosing the top of the structure so the doves will not fly away before they have learned to live in their new home. There is also a small platform at the top of the ladder from which the attendant may clean the nests or feed the birds.

The Cotswold blacksmith is making two large weather-vanes. He has also made the base for one in the form of a cap which will fit over a church steeple.

Movies were taken today of the McGuffey youngsters at play in the yard and minminiature farm beside the log school. Two tiny black ponies were brought for the occasion and hitched to the little cart. The youngsters piled in gaily laughing and shouting, and the camera followed them as they drove off up the road.

An interesting visitor to the Courthouse was Charles L. Scott of Berkley, Michigan, who said his father was a second cousin of John Wilkes Booth, the assassin. He said he was satisfied, after investigating authoritative sources, that Booth was not killed in Garrett's barn, but died a natural death in Australia years later.

ATTENDANCE

Two years ago	540
One year ago	2946
Today	668
This year to date	502,062
Last year to date	473,844